From the Philadelphia Public Ledger. The achievement of Commander Robert E. Peary in reaching 87 degrees 6 minutes north latitude in his latest dash toward the pole has caused a change of opinion on the part of some Arctic experts as to the best route to be followed in future

Peary in his last effort to reach the north pole was not the most favorable one, it now seemed that the route which he had followed might eventually lead to success. Peary was actually within 174 nautical miles of the pole, or 200.3 statute

Admiral Meiville thinks that the chance of success would have been much greater if Peary had taken with him on leaving the ship a light boat on an extra sled, to be used simply for ferrying the broad canals which are frequently formed in the constantly moving expanse of ice. If he had had such a boat, Peary, he believes, might have reached the pole in the time that was lost in the waiting for the great feedrifts to close so that he might continue the use of his sleds.

"The public in general," said Admiral Melville, "has little conception of the actual physical conditions in the Arctic. Traveling over the ice, broken as it is into hummocks, ridges, deep chasms, and jagged projections, is much like traveling over the housetops of Philadelphia. To take an ordinary Arctic sied on such A. Costello, 227 lith st. sw. Cigars, tobaccos, and adash as that which Peary made would be almost out of the question. The lightest one that we had in our retreat from the Jeannette to the Lena Delta weighed 1,800 pounds, and the strength of our whole force of twenty men was required to drag it. But to take a light, specially constructed sled, to be drawn by dogs, would be entirely feasible, and the dogs would be just so much additional 'beef on the hoof,' so to speak, for the subsistence of the expedition in case of need. I see of the expedition in case of need. of the expedition in case of need. I see that the Peary party, as it was, ate eight dogs in the return to the ship.
"I had no idea that Peary would get ____ to the pole by the route which he chose. It seemed to me that the distance from Grant Land, on the northern end of Cooks, maids, and butler (city). "EUREKA," no known terra firma directly north no known terra firma directly north of either and the southward drift of the ice in that region being so rapid. But Peary having got to a point within Peary, having got to a point within 174 miles of the pole, it now seems quite possible that the whole of the ntended journey may be accomplished by that route. Of course, if there were an son CUBAN ASPHALT, 100 CAPUZAYA, H. D. island between Grant Land, or Green-GORDON, Attorney, 615 19th st. nw. nof-3t land, and the pole, it would appear yet more feasible, for then caches of supplies might be made that would give greater chances of safety to the explorers. This statement is illustrated in the fact that Peary lost the caches which he had made in the ice, some of the constantly shifting masses probably having turned over, dumping the provisions into the wafer.
